Photoshop has the ability to do some tasks that are not humanly possible, such as adjusting to the changes in color, brightness, and texture of a subject. In that sense it's a tool for creating images of a kind that were never before possible, but you shouldn't necessarily view Photoshop as a tool for capturing reality. Photoshop is one of the most powerful tools available on the market today, and if you're ready to take advantage of that power, Chapter 5 can help you make the most of your time with this program. Photoshop offers a variety of tools for building and editing images, including the following:

- The Photoshop canvas: The Photoshop canvas is the place where you choose to work, the area where you draw, paint, or lay out your creation. The canvas is the area that contains the entire image.
- Layers: Layers are areas where you can place additional images, and by arranging these areas in different ways, you can build more complex images from simple images. The layers you place in an image are called `_layers_` and these layers are essentially invisible until you make them visible by using the Layers panel. You can add filters, customize the size of your document, move objects on the canvas, change their color, change their shape, and other similar operations.
- Edit images: Photoshop offers a number of image-editing tools that let you edit or manipulate the shape of an image. You can add, move, resize, and rotate objects on your canvas, and you can retouch or cleanse the edges of your image.
- Adjust images: Depending on the image you use, you can apply a variety of adjustments to the image to make it look better. Different types of adjustments include brightness, contrast, coloring, and color balance. You can also blur parts of the image, change colors, and sharpen or soften.
- Organize images: Photoshop has a number of organizing options that let you arrange images based on the type of the image or where it appears in the overall image. You can also arrange your images in the layers to keep them more organized and control where they appear.
- Create images: Creating an image in Photoshop is as simple as clicking two points in a canvas and then going to File⇒New, and then choosing the image type you want.
- Customize images: The simple click-and-drag operations can make a

Tulsi Gabbard and her husband, Abraham Williams-Gabbard, are no strangers to controversy – and not just because their new Netflix show has prompted the Russians to start twittering about Tulsi's anti-Syria agenda. Now that the world is finally getting a chance to see the two in-depth in a raw fashion, it seems they have some trouble keeping their oppositional views separate from the fact that they are married. As they struggle to keep their marriage completely intact, their opponents get more aggressive. The Daily Beast reports: "It's clear she is immune from criticism – a remarkable privilege of office and marriage – and she calls it 'personal attacks' aimed at 'only [her] husband.'" "It's absolutely out of line and uncalled for," she says, claiming to recognize that "my husband, as the military's highest-ranking enlisted soldier and a decorated Iraq war veteran, deserves equal respect in this discourse." Opponents are "taking the same route that they use to attack [me], to discredit me and try to make me look bad: by attacking my husband," she says. She accuses them of "falsely impugning my character and my husband's character," which "just to be clear, my husband hasn't said a word about me." She writes that she and her husband's "disagreements have nothing to do with me or my opinions, which I have repeatedly stated, including in the past election cycle." "The attacks on me are based on a false premise," she writes, accusing her critics of "intertwined personal attacks on me." Gabbard insinuates critics are attacking her and her husband because she is running for president. "This is a just a very effective way of discrediting an opponent," she explains. Gabbard said she and her husband have had to shut down many of their nonprofit projects during their marriage, but she tries to keep those projects focused on their work as a couple. "We've donated more than $100,000 to charity, and we both put in time and effort into it," she says. She accepts her marriage to Williams-

Non-operative treatment of major hip fractures in elderly patients with hip protectors and a walking aid: a randomized controlled trial. Hip fractures in the elderly have a tremendous impact on activities of daily living, emotional well-being, and quality of life. In the present study, we aimed to determine if a simple collar is as effective in preventing hip fractures as complex external fixators in patients who used walking aids. This randomized controlled trial included patients ( $\geq 65$  years of age) with a hip fracture. Patients were randomly assigned to either a collar or an external fixator. After surgery, patients in both groups used a walking aid during a two-year follow-up period. Primary outcome was the rate of subsequent hip fractures. Secondary outcome was the percentage of patients who were able to walk independently. A total of 200 patients were analyzed. Follow-up was 99% complete, and the median follow-up time was 2 years. During the follow-up period, 23 participants sustained additional hip fractures. The hip fracture rate was 30% lower in patients treated with a collar than in patients treated with an external fixator (0.43 vs. 0.58; hazard ratio 0.59 [0.34-1.03];  $P=0.06$ ). The percentage of independent walkers at the two-year follow-up was significantly higher in patients treated with a collar (92.3 vs. 86.8%; odds ratio 2.70 [1.15-6.33];  $P=0.02$ ). The present findings indicate that use of a simple collar instead of a complex external fixator reduces the rate of hip fractures and increases the proportion of independent walkers in elderly patients with hip fractures who use walking aids. This study showed that use of a simple collar instead of a complex external fixator reduced the hip fracture rate and increased the proportion of independent walkers in elderly patients with hip fractures who use walking aids. The present invention relates to an automatic focusing device used in a video camera and, more particularly, to an automatic focusing device capable of detecting a focusing condition. A known automatic focusing device in a video camera such as described in U.S. Pat. No. 4,312,300 employs a system in which a signal indicative of a focusing condition is obtained in response to a focusing signal generated when the focusing condition has been set. The known automatic focusing device shown in FIG. 1 is designed to automatically control an amount of movement of a focusing lens in a camera. The device has a
